STRUCTURAL RACISM WITHIN REASON

Alisa examines reasons and the politics of intention through an analysis of structural racism. She discusses two key black feminist critiques of reason — Patricia Hill Collins' discussion of "controlling images" (2000) and Michelle Cliff's concept of the "mythic mind" (1982) — to propose "controlling intentions" as a framework to theorize how structural racism produces fictive intentions used to rationalize the criminal punishment of survival and justify that outcome as common sense. As an example, she analyzes how Marissa Alexander's intentions and intentional actions were replaced by controlling intentions in her 2011 Stand Your Ground hearing to illustrate how reason provides a vehicle through which structural racial/gendered violence becomes naturalized within the law.
